The year 2026 is the Year of the Horse in the Chinese zodiac. In Chinese culture, the Horse stands for energy, strength, and success. However, the relationship between horses and humans did not begin in modern times. In fact, it has lasted for thousands of years. Since ancient times, people have depended on horses in many parts of the world.

In the past, horses were very important for farming and transportation. Before cars and trains were invented, horses carried people and goods from one place to another. Farmers also used horses to pull heavy tools and work in the fields. Because of their power and speed, horses became valuable partners in daily life. Even today, in some areas, horses are still used for work.

Besides helping with work, horses are also part of human entertainment. Horse racing, for example, is a popular sport in many countries. People admire horses not only for their beauty but also for their amazing speed. It seems that horses are naturally built to run fast because of their special body structures.

First, horses need a large amount of oxygen when they run. Their wide nostrils are shaped to breathe in much more air, which supports their powerful heart and lungs. This helps them keep running at high speed. In addition, their long and strong legs allow them to take large strides, so they can move farther with each step compared to many other animals.

Another interesting behavior of horses is called the Flehmen response. When horses lift their upper lips and show their teeth, they are not smiling. Instead, they are collecting information from the environment. Through this action, they can detect other horses' emotional change and understand signals around them. This response helps them communicate and stay aware of their surroundings.

Because of their unique body structures and abilities, horses have played an important role in the progress of human civilization. They have supported human development in many ways. Next time when you see a horse, take a closer look at its body and observe its actions. You may discover how amazing these animals truly are.

Do you prefer to study alone, or do you enjoy working with others? As academic pressure continues to increase, many students look for more effective ways to improve their learning. One popular method is joining a study group. Instead of facing challenges alone, students can support one another and share ideas. However, study groups can function in different ways depending on the subject being studied.

For instance, in an English study group, members might begin by memorizing vocabulary together and then move on to discussing sentence structures or analyzing reading passages. Through discussion, students can better understand how language works in context. On the other hand, science study groups often focus on solving practice questions first. After completing the questions, members review the answers and analyze the key concepts behind them. In this way, they not only check their mistakes but also strengthen their understanding of important theories.

There are several advantages to studying in a group. First, explaining ideas to others helps build confidence and reinforces one's own knowledge. Teaching someone else is often one of the best ways to learn. In addition, group members can hear different viewpoints and discover new ways of thinking. This exchange of ideas may help students see problems from multiple perspectives and develop critical thinking skills.

Nevertheless, forming an effective study group is not always easy. At the beginning, members may struggle to reach a consensus about study schedules or goals. Some students may also find it difficult to stay focused. Yet, once the group establishes clear objectives and maintains regular meetings, cooperation becomes smoother. By working toward a shared goal, students can combine their strengths and make steady progress. If you have never joined a study group before, perhaps it is time to give it a try.

41. Which advantage of forming a study group is NOT mentioned in the article?

- (A) Members can check their mistakes.
- (B) Members can lower down their academic pressure.
- (C) Members can be more confident.
- (D) Members can create study materials.

42. What would be the core concept of forming a study group?

- (A) Solving questions
- (B) Finding soulmates
- (C) Having new findings
- (D) Exploring the world

43. Who is suitable to join a studying group according to the article?

(A) Amy: “I prefer to keep my ideas to myself.”

(B) Lisa: “I am good at scheduling travel plans.”

(C) Karina: “I have trouble organizing my time for school subjects.”

(D) Joseph: “I always wait for others’ answers.”
